

Although some restaurants have been coping reasonably well with the current situation through delivery and to-go orders, others have been hit very hard and it is likely that many will not survive to reopen after the quarantining ends. What do you expect will happen? For example, will there be a shortage of restaurant capacity, especially if people who have not been able to go out for quite some time will want to go out in large numbers as “pent up” demand?

Farmers' Markets would seem to be horrendously inefficient. Each farmer can only bring products that he or she has grown and must often travel a considerable distance to get to the market. In terms of the discrepancy of assortment, each farmer only sells a limited number of products but must have at least one person on hand to do the sales. Are there reasons, nevertheless, why farmers' markets may nevertheless make economic sense?
